The Agricultural Revolution

In addition to factories in growing cities, people's use of fossil-fuel-powered machines changed the way they farmed, creating an agricultural "revolution." Plows that were pulled by horses could be pulled by tractors. Harvests that had to be cut by hand were cut by combines. The result was more and cheaper food. This allowed the world's population to grow and the population growth increased the demand for food.

Irrigation allows people to farm in the desert, as seen here in the Sahara. This helps supply food, but a lot of greenhouse gas emissions can come from this type of farming.

Sowing Environmental Problems

The new agricultural methods contributed to global climate change in many ways, such as from burning fossil fuels to power farm equipment. The demand for food pushed people to build more farms, cutting down forests that were taking carbon dioxide out of the atmosphere. Irrigation pulled more water from the ground, draining reservoirs and making areas more prone to drought. Some fertilizers were also made by extracting chemicals from fossils fuels such as oil, adding more carbon dioxide to the atmosphere. The number of livestock increased and its excrement, or waste, caused an increase in another greenhouse gas: methane.

As with the Industrial Revolution, changes in agriculture have added to greenhouse gas emissions and global climate change, but they may be even harder to stop. Making less food means making food more expensive. Maybe people can afford to pay more for an automobile that is produced in a more environmentally friendly way, but can a person going hungry be expected to pay more for their food?

Despite all the food that is grown today, areas of the world still suffer famine. The question of how we can farm responsibly becomes difficult to answer when people need food to eat.

The Energy Future: You Choose

Irrigation makes farms possible in places that are dry, but these farms use up a lot of energy and water and add to the greenhouse effect. Without the farms, however, there would be a lot less to eat and food would be more expensive. Are people willing to pay more for the food they eat to make sure it is grown in an environmentally sustainable way? The world's population today is seven billion, and it could rise as high as nine billion by 2050. Can enough food be grown for everyone and the environment still be protected? Discuss and support your reasons why with examples and evidence from the book. Include ways technology might play a part.

Well-crafted text helps readers identify the author's point and supporting details. (RI.5.8.)

Text-based questions requiring evidence to support argument (RI.5.1. W.5.1. W.5.9.)

Domain-specific words are reinforced throughout the text to support vocabulary development. (RI.5.4.)
